Answer

The story about rats swimming for 60 hours after believing they would be rescued is not accurate. The experiment conducted by Dr. Curt Richter at Harvard University in the 1950s involved rats placed in water to test their endurance. The rats did not swim for 60 hours after a break; instead, they were observed to give up and sink after about 15 minutes. The claim that they swam for an extended period due to hope is a misinterpretation. The forced swim test is a standard procedure used in research to evaluate antidepressant effects, not to demonstrate the power of hope. The experiment's actual purpose was to study the rats' behavior under stress, not to showcase the impact of belief or hope on their endurance.

Answer

Yes, it is true that Angelina Jolie did not bathe for 7 days before a National Geographic photo shoot with bees. Bees are sensitive to smells, and the lack of bathing helped prevent them from stinging due to strong scents. During the shoot, thousands of bees were flying around her as she posed for 18 minutes, showcasing a bold and noble gesture to honor these crucial insects on World Bee Day <sup>4</sup> <sup>5</sup>. This unique experience highlighted the delicate balance between humans and bees, emphasizing the importance of bee conservation and the essential role these pollinators play in our ecosystem.
